Foreword

The 'permanent residential caravan' has undergone considerable development in size, services and materials. This British Standard was first introduced in 1963 and the 1970 revision recognized changes relevant at that time. This edition takes note of the introduction of the Mobile Homes Act, 1975 and the title has been changed accordingly.

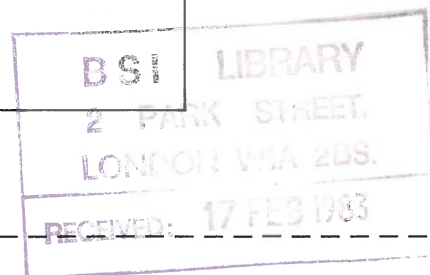

This further revision has regard to criteria appropriate to more conventional forms of housing and is aimed at ensuring the suitability of a mobile home as a permanent dwelling as far as is compatible with this form of construction.

Specification for mobile homes

Revised text

AMD 4190
February 1983

Clause 4.4 Doors and windows

After the first paragraph, insert the following new paragraph.

'If a porch is fitted over an external door of a mobile home, any external door of the porch shall open outwards and give direct access to the open air. A porch door shall not impede nor be impeded by the full opening of the external door of the mobile home and no other door within the porch shall obstruct the means of escape. No ventilation opening of the mobile home nor terminal to the flue of any fuel burning appliance shall be located within an enclosed porch.'

AMD 4190

Clause 4.5 Means of escape

Delete the first sentence and substitute the following.

'Dining rooms, bedrooms and living rooms shall each be provided with a means of escape by a door or a window which shall give direct access to the open air. In the case of a door this may be through a porch, the access to the external door of which shall comply with the requirements of 4.4.'
